Abstract: In recent years the world economy is facing a re-emergence of an actor that once stood as one of the two poles of economic influence in the world, the Russian Federation. Russia's position in the global economy is largely determined by the peculiarities of its space, its properties and qualities. Territorial density and organization of economic life, infrastructural development of the territory and its innovation - to a large extent, affect the competitiveness of the Russian economy and its ability to become a center of regional integration. In order to assess the Russian economic situation we need to consider the dynamics of the regions because Russia can not be interpreted as whole. We propose in this paper, an interpretation of economic dynamics of the Russian regions in order to understand the source of Russian re-emergence on the international economic stage. The model of analyze will consist in assessing the economic performance of the Russian regions selected for the study in correlation with indicators that emerge from a large spectrum from population density and patent application to geography.
